

Creating Worlds

This is just a story to make us think

There was a fairly steady flow in and out of the main office. The analysts were reporting the numbers for the period to the Master, who always showed a great interest in the results. He studied them in great detail, and discussed their meaning with the workers as He planned His next moves.

They talked of a special measurement that was the key to their study, which was integrated into the overall assessment. The parameter measured was a type of relationship energy, and it represented the flow of feelings from the different regions in to the kingdom center. In a word, it represented worship.

The different regions were actually different worlds, and each contained a different type of people. The Great Creator had created all of them, and interacted with each. In each one He desired to have a kingdom and a people, and to have relationships with those who would love Him. The point of the evaluation was not to see which world was best, but watch the growth of the Universal Kingdom.

The angel analysts, each of whom was a soul who had once lived on one of the created worlds, discussed the nature of their Master as they came to and fro. One asked another if he knew why the Creator had done all of this, why He created all of these worlds and types of people. The other understood that this is exactly His nature: to continually be involved in creation.

The first asked what God actually gets out of creating and caring for all of these beings, as He does not really need anything. But since God is Love, He must be involved in nourishing and expressing this ultimate characteristic in all of His relationships.

The various worlds were in all stages of development. Most had fallen, and though some were still holding out against the adversary, their strength was insufficient. The characteristics of the created souls varied from one world to the next, only because the Creator enjoyed looking at things with different points of view. The universal war between Good and Evil was not yet finished, and so each world had to go its own way and be wooed by its Creator. And for each world He had a plan to redeem those who would follow Him. In every case He became one of them and showed the power of His love by sacrificing Himself for them.

There were so many of these worlds to consider. But as God can name the stars<sup>1</sup>, then He can also name all of His peoples. And His infinite nature is such that he can still have personal relationships with all of the individual beings in His Creation.

The two analysts conferred again, wondering how God could pour so much love out and get so little in return. There seemed to be an imbalance in the flow, yet the loves were not really the same. They were therefore not comparable, and equality was never the goal. God wanted those who worshipped Him with all of their being, even if the total output was infinitesimally, almost immeasurably small.

1. Psalm 147:4

Picture a scene where there are workers of some type and they are examining reports of different worlds and the relationship energy that is being returned to God; one of the workers was a soul that lived on one world, and another worker is a soul that lived on another;

What does God really get out of caring for these people or creating these people; what could it be that we could do for God, who really needs nothing; but it is the nature of God to nourish these relationships; that's how love is expressed;

G&E type of story

Feelings meter? G&E style? Have I done this before? Savor the feeling – even sorrow; similar to Screwtape letters

Naming these characters is difficult; there are so many, it is like naming the stars; God says that he names all of the stars (worlds); it is hard to think of a way that He could deal with so many and still be personal, yet that is what God does with us; that might work into the comm comm about being irradiated about the stars that you cannot see; God has named them personally,

Subset

- Sodom and Gomorrah
- What is the quantifying parameter? (aver, mean, std)
- run out of patience

Do they all fall? If so, there would be a Christ for all

Are they still looking for the one that doesn't fall?

Satan: isolated to earth?

Christ: visiting all, dying for each
