

The Inverse Prodigal Husband

There was a woman who had a husband. The wife said to her husband, 'Husband, take your personal possessions and get out of this house!' She told him that he had sinned against her, and was no longer worthy to be called her husband.

So he took his things and left. He was stripped of most of his possessions, though he still had to pay the wife a monthly living allowance.

The husband rented a small apartment and lived a very simple life so that he would have enough money to get by. He began to enjoy life once again after many oppressed years; he never wanted to go back.

After he had gone, the wife got a job, and there were so many things to do now in the yard and around the house that she began to be in need of help.

The wife had divorced her husband because she thought of him as a burden, but she still found her life hard for some reason. There wasn't any time or energy for the parties she had planned.

The only son was confused about the whole thing because he did not understand how love can fail so terribly.

He originally stayed with his mother, but after a time he realized that he had to leave as well. He went to stay with his father.

The father was overjoyed to have his son back and put on a huge feast to welcome him.

© Heard Lowry, 2010.